~~I bought this book for my 8yr old daughter who studied the ancient Mayans/history of cocoa at school. She loved it, and the teacher loved it so much she didn't only base a lot of their work around the book, but also got her own copy. They even had a chocolatier come in and make a chocolate tree with them!~~

~~Vermont's not exactly known for its tropical weather, but even with our long cold winters, you can still grow and harvest your own chocolate indoors. The cacao trees below were grown from a pod harvested New Hampshire, and germinated in my Vermont home, both zone 4. The New Hampshire parent tree grown by a friend is about 6 feet tall, and produces a crop of 2 to 5 pods per year, blooming in the summer and ripening mid-winter.~~

~~In the wild, chocolate trees can usually be found beneath the shade of the rainforest canopy, which means filtered light is best for them. Young cacao trees will grow on a windowsill, but they will outgrow it. Keep them in dappled shade. Keep your cacao plant away from direct sunlight and intense heat sources, as these may cause it to dry out.~~
