Ford Madox Brown was a famous British artist from the 19th century whose work was closely related to the Pre-Raphaelite art movement. He was uniquely Hogarthian in many ways, but did draw in many aspects of the Brotherhood's style, such as bright colour and precise detail. Brown's family would move constantly around Northern Europe and this allowed the artist to draw in a variety of artistic experiences from an early age.

This is one of the finest novels (or, rather, four novels) to be written in English in the twentieth century and, while it certainly has not been forgotten, it does not, I feel, get its due. It deals with Englishness in a way that few have matched.
